To Whom It May Concern:

As representatives of the global fashion and sportswear related industries, and its enablers and stakeholders, we are coming together to urge supranational, national, and local authorities around the world to modernize their domestic textile, garment, footwear, and related accessories labeling requirements and legally allow and support the use of more sustainable and economic, digital labels for required labeling information.

During the past 60 years, a confusing array of labeling requirements – relating to care instructions/symbols, fiber content, importer requirements, and origin of textiles, garments, footwear, and related accessories – have proliferated around the world. Created with the best of intentions to enable consumers to make informed buying decisions, these requirements are now hindering the industry’s efforts to be more sustainable and support the circular economy, including the enhancement of traceability. Industry estimates show that, collectively, these requirements now result in the annual production of approximately 5.7 million miles (about 9.2m km) of label tape – enough to stretch from the earth to the moon, and back, twelve times each year.

Fortunately, digital technology solutions – such as QR code labels – are now available to cut the considerable amount of material that these regulations require our industry to produce. Shifting to the use of digital labels would significantly reduce labeling waste and significantly aid in decarbonization efforts, resulting in the elimination of at least 343,000 MT of CO2e from industry supply chains.

Indeed, reacting to the growing interest by consumers to receive information digitally, governments around the world are starting to embrace digital approaches – such as the proposed EU digital product passport and replacement of traditional labelling requirements with the option to use electronic labeling for consumer electronics products (e.g., Singapore, Australia).

But to really move the needle, we need to take bolder action and, if we can do so, the opportunities are endless.

- Amending supranational, national and local regulations to allow the adoption of fully digital labeling solutions would enable consumers to access more detailed and accurate information about the textiles, garments, footwear, and related accessories they are considering buying, such as more in-depth materials and origin information and supply chain details, without the industry being held back because of a need for the physical (limited) space for a label, and that can be updated in real-time to support more resilient supply chains.
- Product information would also become more accessible to a wider range of consumers, making it easier to read (including for individuals who are sight impaired) and be delivered in languages easily understood by them.
- Reducing the excessive amount of unwieldy and uncomfortable labeling tape the industry currently uses to a simple QR code or other digitally enabled tool would also discourage consumers from cutting off labels after purchase and ensure that the product's information remains available throughout the garment's lifecycle.
- Keeping this information with the product – which is what consumers and policy makers alike want – would make these products more useful and valuable for longer periods in the circular economy while unlocking new opportunities for resale, repair, rental, upcycling, or recycling.

With greater demand for more traceability, transparency, and accountability from all stakeholders in the industry's global value chain, the time for supranational, national and local authorities to act and update these outdated, inflexible, and complex labeling requirements and empower their consumers with more accessible information through greener e-labeling is now.

We look forward to working with you to build a more responsible and agile industry.
